The plan of the French and British secret services to destabilize Europe through a new Gladio

by Cesare Sacchetti
7th Dec 2024

Turmoil appears to be the 'norm' in these agitated weeks in Europe.

The strategy of planned chaos has not even had time to stir up unrest in four separate theatres: Syria, Korea, Ukraine, and Georgia, when new news of coup attempts are already arriving.

This is what is happening in Romania, where yesterday the country's Constitutional Court ruled on the 'invalidity' of the elections held a fortnight ago due to alleged Russian interference.

One can now see with the naked eye all the hypocrisy with which Western liberal democracies are imbued, which, when the result that comes out of the ballot box, no longer satisfies the interests of the managers of such political systems, have no qualms about saying that the elections are a fraud and that the Kremlin got inside the voters' heads to make them vote for the party most pleasing to Moscow.

We are once again confronted with the same evidence. Liberal democracy was not made for the people, but for the masonic and financial elites, who already chose this system after the inauspicious French revolution because it was simply the best way to serve their interests. The people should have realised this by now, for when they see that there is no real political offer that can in any way serve the interests of the fatherland, then they abstain from voting, saturated by the farce, and when they see instead that there is some offer that can perhaps pull them out of the dictatorship of the financial oligarchies, then magically the elections are not fair.

It's a rigged roulette. It does not matter which number you bet, it is always the 'democratic' banker who decides which number should come out when the ball stops spinning. Georgescu has not yet expressed an official position on the decision of the Romanian togati, but it is doubtful that he will sit on his hands while the country's judiciary tries to steal an election from him that he probably would have won hands down, and certainly not because of the phantom Russian interference, which was also used in the coup against Trump, known as Spygate.

However, the decision of the Romanian togaths appears to be a mistake, because if they vote again, and if there is no electoral fraud, Georgescu's consensus will rise even higher, and then the various Euro-Atlantic conspirators will only have to attempt another operation like the one attempted against the Slovak prime minister, Robert Fico, who miraculously escaped an assassination attempt on his life in recent months, and a similar fate was unfortunately befalling Viktor Orban, although Hungarian intelligence fortunately managed to foil plans to kill the Hungarian premier.

However, this does not seem to be enough in the eyes of this chaos powerhouse that now has blood in its eyes and is trying to defend the EU's increasingly fragile fortress.

The European Union itself already appears to be plagued by a serious internal crisis, if we consider that the two countries on whose weak shoulders the whole EU shack used to rest, France and Germany, are beset by serious political crises, and one of the two, Germany, will certainly go back to the polls in the coming months, while the other, is trying to stall through Macron's attempts to prolong the legislature despite Prime Minister Barnier's lack of confidence.

It seems clear that Europe's liberal-democratic systems have reached the last stage of their existence, and there is nothing to be done to keep them alive. Any attempt to reverse course is a form of therapeutic overkill that ultimately has radically opposite effects.

The plan of the French and British secret services for a new Gladio

In spite of this, as we have seen, there is no logic to be found on the EU and NATO sides, and in an attempt to halt or slow down the crisis of the EU and liberal-democracy, the old manual of political destabilisation used last century to keep Italy and European countries within the NATO enclosure is being reopened.

The information came from Serbian intelligence circles. The British and French secret services, the notorious MI6 and DGSE, are said to be studying a new European tension strategy.

The two intelligence apparatuses would have in mind a sort of Stay Behind 2.0, the infamous Gladio that at the time of the First Republic had the purpose of going into action if there was an invasion of the USSR in Western Europe.

In reality, the 'gladiators' did not have this purpose so much as that of helping the Western services to carry out those terrorist attacks that were officially carried out by various terrorist acronyms, such as the RB [Red Brigades] and the NAR [Nuclei Armati Rivoluzionari = Armed Revolutionary Nuclei], but behind which there were, in reality, the apparatus' of the secret services.

As a demonstration of the conjunction between the services and terrorism, just think of this clamorous event omitted from official historiography.

The two leaders of the RB and the NAR, Mario Moretti and Giusva Fioravanti, both chose as their base of operations not only the same address but also the same flat block in Via Gradoli 96, where the vast majority of the flats were in the name of SISDE [Italian intelligence agency] front companies.

Mario Moretti, R.B. 'leader' at the time of the Moro kidnapping

Terrorism lived side by side with the door of the intelligence services, and the latter certainly did not think of disturbing the former, since this served to achieve the aims that NATO held most dear.

It served to sow a trail of blood and terror in the country, without which, in the eyes of its inspirers, there would not have been that necessary pressure on Italy and on those politicians, such as Aldo Moro, who were jeopardising Atlantic interests and who aspired one day to take the country out of the Euro-Atlantic cage and out of the Cassibile armistice, through which General Castellano handed over the keys of sovereignty to the Anglosphere masters in 1943.

Those were very different years because at that time the United States was fully guarding the empire on which Atlantic supremacy and that of the various Zionist lobbies that have written Washington's foreign policy were founded.

The current phase is very different. Washington and Brussels have parted ways since the beginning of the Trump era, and now the US has gone from being the protector of the EU to the enemy of the EU bloc, seen as a hindrance to a return to nation states.

The EU is, in other words, the last resort and that is why the spokesmen of such a system like Carlo Calenda became so agitated when they saw Trump's official return and when they learned of the German and French crises.

Attempts are being made to defend the last bunker, but this one is now ravaged by cracks and opponents are marching towards it in every direction.

The desperate situation, however, does not seem to have dissuaded the French and British intelligence agencies, who have decided to play the card of the resurgence of the old strategy of tension, which, if it succeeds, is likely to manifest itself in the coming months.

The evolutions of the Euro-Atlantic strategy of tension

While the context has certainly changed from that of 50 years ago, the procedures, on the other hand, are substantially the same, and the services in question are said to be studying a series of sabotage attacks on the various infrastructures, for example, the fires that have been seen for the last two years, especially in Rome, together with possible attacks to be obviously attributed to Islamic terrorism, in a manner not very dissimilar to what was seen, for example, at the time of the attack on the editorial office of the blasphemous weekly 'satirical' Charlie Hebdo.

Only the intensity and regularity of such terrorist acts should change, but the modus operandi would be almost unchanged.

The first strategy of tension made use of 'red' and 'black' terrorism to carry out those massacres necessary to adumbrate the bogeyman of an artificial enemy, and to force Italy with blood and violence not to go beyond the perimeter assigned to it by NATO.

The second strategy of tension, which has begun above all since the stabbings and attacks in Northern Europe, uses instead alleged Islamist cells, protected by the French services and often directed by them and the ever-present Israeli intelligence.

The aforementioned case of Charlie Hebdo remains a perfect case study. In that attack, there were already elements obviously overlooked by the mainstream media, starting with the description of the attackers, who according to witnesses had clear eyes, and were very far from Arab-looking.

Even for the attack that took place 11 months after the Charlie Hebdo one, i.e. the Bataclan massacre in November 2015, there were elements indicating Israeli participation in the attacks.

This was discovered by journalist Hicham Hamza , who had the 'wrong' to discover that the first photo of the Bataclan attack was shared by an Israeli organisation headed by Mark Gerson in the United States.

The Bataclan massacre

Hamza was immediately arrested and then released by the French authorities who had nothing to incriminate the man who had brought out a truth that French intelligence wanted to remain well hidden.

In a manner almost identical to the 9/11 attacks, French Jews were warned in advance that a terrorist attack would take place in Paris on 13 November 2015 in the French Bataclan theatre, and they stayed away from that area, just as American Jews did who did not go to work in the Twin Towers on the day of the attacks, 11 September 2001.

The Mossad are masters at such tactics of concealment of attacks known as 'false flags' in which the agents carrying them out disguise themselves as their adversaries in order to blame the latter for such attacks and thus hurl public reaction against them.

This was explained by, among others, an MI5 agent, Annie Machon, who revealed that the attack on the Israeli embassy in London in 1994 was not carried out by Palestinian groups, but by Mossad agents in disguise.

7 October 2023 is another example of such logic. There are numerous testimonies and videos confirming that it was the Israeli armed forces themselves who opened fire at the Nova festival against Israeli civilians, but the Western mainstream media thought it best to censor the whole thing so as not to disturb the media concert that continually quoted Hamas, without saying that it was the Israeli military that wanted to kill other Israelis.

It cannot be ruled out that the Mossad may also be involved in this attempt at recrudescence that the various European intelligence agencies are studying, but at the moment the Jewish state seems more entangled in a sort of creeping civil war, and Netanyahu's fate is still unclear after the attack on his plane on 29 September last, and his last trip abroad that dates back to that time.

At this turn, if sabotage and attacks of this kind are attempted, they will probably be at close range, even if the execution of these plans for their planners is becoming increasingly complicated, especially given the political crises gripping the services of these countries.

If Macron manages to take some more time after the end of the Barnier government, he will at most be able to extend the duration of the legislature by a few months, but he will hardly make it to the end of the planned five-year term.

In Berlin, the situation is even more critical because the elections are already set and the German political system seems to be going through the same structural crisis that is affecting the Italian one and has long since failed to offer answers to the needs of Germans affected by the violent deindustrialisation underway.

Once again, the gambler's metaphor seems the most appropriate to describe the condition in which the EU currently finds itself.

Hopes of recouping losses are slim to none, and any further attempts to raise the stakes could do even more damage to those who would choose this path, but lucidity is not, as we have seen, at home on the side of these characters.

There is the blind fury of those who believed they were all-powerful and who now discover that history does not belong to them and that the EU is far from having the immutability that some fools in Brussels believed it had.

The EU is the most fragile and weakest edifice of all because, as mentioned earlier, it lacks American life support and has to deal internally with serious internal political crises that are becoming more acute every day.

This is a very delicate phase in history because we are entering the final cycle of the existence of an authoritarian project conceived a century ago by Count Kalergi, and we are travelling faster and faster towards the return of national sovereignty.

Between these two phases, however, there is a short but intense ford to be crossed, and it is in this ford that the various architects of chaos are trying to increase the turmoil and unrest as much as possible, now in the grip of a destructive fever that urges them to inflict as much damage as possible on the other side before capitulating.

However, one cannot help but notice how this phase of history bears a striking resemblance to what was predicted by various saints and mystics in the Catholic tradition, according to whom Europe would see the end of liberal democracies and the return of national monarchies.

With each passing day, that date in history seems to draw closer and closer.

Terrorist attack in Germany. A car ran into the crowd at a [Christmas] market in Magdeburg. We had written that the European secret services, primarily French and British, were planning a tail-end to the strategy of tension to destabilise Europe in view of the probable collapse of the EU. Here they unfortunately went into action.

Attacco terroristico in Germania. Un'auto ha travolto la folla ad un mercatino di Magdeburgo. Avevamo scritto che i servizi segreti europei, francesi e inglesi in primis, stavano pianificando una coda della strategia della tensione per destabilizzare l'Europa in vista del probabile crollo dell'UE. Eccoli entrati purtroppo in azione.
